EXTRACTS.

FOREVER.

Those who have tried never die,
Though years may pass and the memorial wreath,
A ring of flowers, types of life and death,
Are laid upon their graves.

For death the pure life saves,
And life, all pure and true, and love can reach
From heaven to earth, and nobler lessons teach
Than those by mortal reach.

Will tell it to who has a dear one dead;
A friend who has a wife and a child,
A dear one who will not grow strange;
The father of a loved one dead.

The blessed sweetest of a loving breath
Will reach my cheek all fresh through weary years.
For long ago died long since, all waste not tears,
She's there in my soul.

Thank God for one dear friend,
With face still radiant with the light of truth,
Whom I have known in the past with soul of youth,
Through twenty years of death.

JOHN BOWEN O'BRIEN, in Boston Pilot.

A GENUINE GHOST.

Years before the Society for Psychical Research commenced its mysterious investigations, I had, single-handed, in a great measure anticipated the object which led to its formation. So far as one person, who grudges neither time nor money to the pursuit of truth, can do, I had hunted and walked ghost-haunted and apparition-haunted, and I had been so successful in my search that I had been able to find the existence or non-existence of each with the impartiality of an English judge.

Intensely fascinating as at first I found the pursuit, after a while my chases began to present the same monotonous features. Intelligence would reach me that a ghost had made its appearance in some town or village in England. No matter where the favoured spot might be, I started for it at once, full of hope that I had at last found the place where the ghost was to be seen. I was, however, disappointed. I found the place where the ghost was to be seen, but I found no ghost.

The same with deserted houses said to be haunted by cellars to garrets. Night after night I had watched in various dwellings bearing this unenviable distinction, yet had suffered from no visitors, save the rheumatic pains which generally followed a night passed in a cold room, and the discomfort of an empty house. So it was that, having for some years given the ghost a fair trial, I was reluctantly compelled to come to the conclusion that supernatural visitations are but figments of a superstitious brain.

Judge, then, my delight when, at last, I stumbled upon what to all appearances was a genuine, well-authenticated family ghost, in a fine state of preservation. My emotion can only be compared to those of a chemist who lights upon an unknown piece of Haemite deerskins. Forgetting my countless disappointments, I threw myself eagerly and hopefully on the trail, and for once my chase was not a vain one.

The ghost in question was the property of Sir Percival Morton, or, perhaps, I should rather say, it was an apparition to the estate in which he had a life interest. Sir Percival Morton was a baronet who lived in the West of England, at a fine place called Wick Court. His family, for a baronet's, was of great antiquity, and there were many other qualifications which promised well for my success.

Armed with a letter of introduction from a mutual friend, one late autumn day I presented myself at Wick Court. I was somewhat disappointed to find the house was a comparatively modern erection—it being a generally-understood thing that ghosts prefer the discomfort and inconveniences of old-fashioned mansions.

Sir Percival Morton was one of the most proud and pompous men it has been my lot to meet. At first he absolutely declined to give me any information on the subject of the family spectre, and when, after much entreaty and some flattery, he consented to enlighten me, I was compelled to assure him that I was in no way connected with a newspaper.

"Ha-hum," said Sir Percival, "you see that old family are obliged to these days to be reticent concerning their ancestral apartments. As a rule these are connected with dark tales and tragedies which are not for the vulgar ear."

It was this very unwillingness to give information which assured me that I was at last on the track of real ghost—like this in fact, I should find no shallow, unstable impostor. So I agreed with Sir Percival's remarks, humoured him to the top of his bent, and by-and-by heard the truth about his ghost.

It was a ghost with some marked peculiarities. Like many other reputed spirits, appeared once a year. In its case the peculiarity was in its mechanical change of form. It was the week from Sir Percival's own observation it was to be seen on the Monday night which was the nearest to November the 29th. It confined its operations to an outbuilding which in olden times was used as a chapel. This chapel, now in ruins, was the only existing part of old Wick Court. The present house was built by Sir Percival's grandfather in this dilapidated place of old-world worship the apparition showed itself, once a year, and after performing various mysterious ghostly antics, departed, and left the place at peace for twelve months.

Sir Percival told me all this at first, not second hand. In some things, in spite of his self-importance, he was a man of my own heart, inasmuch that he had no vulgar fear of spiritual visitations. Indeed, he gravely informed me that out of respect to the restless spirit of one of his own kin he made a point of spending the night in the chapel whenever the apparition was due. I humoured the man for his bravery and family pride. I need not say how interesting this talk was to me, and how I began to have a respect for the ghost. I had, however, no respect for the ghost. I had, however, no respect for the ghost.

Sir Percival had clearly thrived before the respectful interest I manifested in the ghost, for presently he asked me if I would like to inspect the ruined chapel. I gladly accepted the offer.

It was a building of about thirty feet long, the roof was gabled, and the windows lancet-shaped. Fragments of white plaster still clung to the walls and ceiling, in the latter of which were holes opening to the sky. My heart beat joyfully. It was the very place for a ghost!

which when entire must have been about eight feet long. I asked for an explanation. "I am inclined to believe," he said, "that the remains of an instrument of torture called a rack. You will notice," he continued, "picking up a fragment of wood, 'this piece is rounded. I take it, it is part of one of the rollers or windlasses around which the rope was passed."

My curiosity was greatly excited. I turned to Sir Percival. "Oh, Sir Percival!" I exclaimed, "may I ask you a great favour. Believe me, I approach this matter not in vulgar inquisitiveness, but in reverential interest. Will you permit me to be present when the spirit makes its next appearance? I might even be able to give you some assistance in fathoming the mystery which has hitherto baffled you."

"I fear you would waste your time, my dear sir," said Sir Percival rather loftily. "As a rule, ancestral ghosts are invisible to a stranger's eyes."

"Permit me to make the attempt—it can do me no harm," I said. "I will take the matter into consideration," said Sir Percival with gracious condescension. Shortly afterwards we parted.

All through the latter part of October and the early part of November I was on thorns of suspense. That Sir Percival's ghost was a bona fide article I felt assured. The question was, would its owner grant my request? I ventured to write and once more urge it, and my joy was great when he at last wrote me and asked me to come down to Wick Court on Monday, November 21. My only fear was lest some absurd family pride on the part of the ghost might induce it to remain invisible to my eyes.

I received my cordial invitation, as was due to an invited guest. Lady Morton and the family were away, so my host and I dined and spent the evening alone. It was easy to see that the yearly task which the baronet laid upon himself was one which weighed by no means lightly. As the hours passed by he grew silent and moody. I respected his feelings and left him undisturbed to his gloom, and in the end, I waited a quarter to twelve.

"It is time—come," he said solemnly. "The night being foggy, we wrapped ourselves warmly. Then we groped our way across the grounds to the ruined chapel. We entered, and Sir Percival struck a match, and producing one of those pointed iron candlesticks used by wine merchants to stick in the candles, he lit the candle. He then forced the iron between the joint of two stones. The light was a mere nothing for so large a building; but it was better than darkness. On the tip-toe of expectation I awaited the development of events.

Presently Sir Percival sighed deeply and touched me on the arm. I followed the direction of his gaze, and in the centre of the chapel saw to my intense delight a nebulous cloudy substance forming. In a minute this had taken shape and form. It resolved itself into what appeared to be the semblance of a woman. My heart gave a throb, but I felt no fear. At last, after years of weary search, I was face to face with a ghost.

"Can you see anything?" asked my companion in an awed whisper. His face looked deadly white under the flickering candle. "Oh yes, quite plainly," I answered, cheerfully.

I fancied Sir Percival looked rather annoyed. No doubt he thought a family ghost should not be so free with her favours. But he said nothing; indeed, he had done as I should not have heard him, so intensely interested was I in studying the apparition. In spite of the gloom, scarcely broken by the feeble light of the candle, I could see it plainly. Indeed, after due consideration I have, judging by my own experience, come to the conclusion that ghosts best with their own means of illumination.

However, this theory is out of place here, for I have embodied it in a pamphlet, which I purpose submitting to the Psychical Society. Anyway, that night I saw the semblance of a woman—a middle-aged woman, her face grave and lined by care, hopeless despair written on every feature. Her arms were bare, and her long, attenuated arms were stretched out before her. Her iron grey hair was dishevelled and unkempt. It did not stream down her back, but was twisted up, in hasty fashion, as though she had been suddenly called from her toilet. The feeling at once stole over me that even now the poor restless spirit was enduring the tortures of the damned.

This vision of mine may have been enhanced by the remarkable change of temperature which attended the appearance of the phantom. Cold as the air was when we entered the chapel, it was suddenly ventilated as the building by the holes in the roof, in less than five minutes perspiration was starting from every pore in my skin. I was fast to unbutton my coat, and I noticed that Sir Percival was in a mechanical way following my example. It may be true, but my fancy, by now and again it seemed to me that a red light flashed along the wall of the chapel.

Moreover, a sickly, cloying, but at the same time not unfamiliar odour seemed to permeate the strangely-heated atmosphere. I congratulated myself that the spirit I had found was far removed from the conventional type.

Now as the most important part—the serious of the ghost. I am right in calling these most important, as a consensus of evidence shows that it is only by its actions that a disembodied spirit is able to give information as to the reason for its appearance. It is the object of the research. To avoid any risk of error, I decided to take a word for word as I jotted them down immediately after the interview with Sir Percival's family ghost came to an end.

1st.—For at least twenty minutes the spectral woman, in the attitude of one bent by bodily pain or anguish of mind, worked her hands with feverish rapidity against the other. Mem.—She stood at the side of the chapel with her face turned to the wall.

2nd.—She stood erect, and for a while seemed as if engaged in a struggle. Her hands grasped some unseen object, possibly, in the flesh, a human arm; she seemed to throw all her strength into her grip, and by the peculiar rotary motion of her hands, began to twist the limb until the agony of her victim must have been past endurance.

3rd.—She proceeded slowly to the corner of the building in which stood the decayed rack. Here she paused, and after some moments, the meaning of which I have not yet comprehended, began slowly to move her hands as one who turns a windlass.

4th.—I watched this last action, I could almost persuade myself that I could see the shadow and abnormally extended limbs of the poor wretch upon whom such diabolic tortures had been perpetrated.

Altogether, this ghastly pantomime must have lasted for an hour and a half. Then the spectral woman, with the same slow step came towards us. Sir Percival Morton fell upon his knees. His voice echoed through the lofty building.

"Infinite spirit of my unknown ancestor," he cried theatrically, but, for all that, with emotion. "Every night may I lay the repose of the guilty soul of Sir Percival Morton at thy feet. Teach me how to lay thy victim at rest."

The ghost gave him a long look of angry hatred, and without further sign or token vanished from our sight.

"I am going back to the house, where for a couple of hours we sat up discussing the case in all its bearings. 'There is no doubt,' said Sir Percival, 'that in bygone ages some fearful deed of darkness took place in that chapel. Everything seems to point to a prolonged succession of tortures. But as to who was tortured, or by whom, he or she was tortured, or the torture was applied, I have not a grain of information. I would give much to learn the truth.'

"You have gone through all the old family papers, I suppose?" "All; but they throw no light on the subject," said Sir Percival. "I am a little fond of that finding out why the ghost haunted the chapel was only second in importance to seeing it. So I made a bold request."

"I am an idle man, Sir Percival," I said. "Would you mind my making researches in your family records?" He reflected for a minute; then he said with great politeness, 'an ancestor's living voice to show herself to me, I will give you access at all times to the muniment-room.' I thanked him, and resolved to stay at Wick Court until I had learnt why that poor tortured spirit haunted the earth.

The interest I took in the matter may be imagined when I say that for weeks and weeks I delved and delved amongst the dusty old papers of parchment in the muniment-room. I found much that would have interested an antiquary, but nothing which bore upon the particular psychical research in which I was engaged. I was much nettled. I had now been Sir Percival's guest for a long time, and I felt myself pledged to solve the mystery. At last I found a clue.

One morning I turned up a little brown-covered book. I opened it carelessly. It was a kind of diary kept by Sir Percival's father. Curiously enough, I opened it at the date of Nov. 20, 1819. Here I read this passage: "That unfortunate woman Sarah Jopland took her own life this morning. I have been hard upon her, Heaven forgive me!"

Here was a discovery! A woman upon whom the late Sir Percival had "been hard" destroyed herself on Nov. 20, 1819. This first recorded appearance of the spectre in Nov., 1820! My hands trembled so that I let the book fall. I was now fairly on the track, but resolved to say nothing to my host concerning my great discovery until I had completely mastered the case.

First of all, I endeavoured to find out what relation this Sarah Jopland stood towards the late baronet. I could not help jumping to the conclusion that there must have been an illicit amour between the two. Such intrigues are prolific ghost-producers. But even if my suspicion was correct, it would not account for the torture unless it were permitted to torment the guilty. I was permitted to torment the guilty. I was permitted to torment the guilty.

As soon as his back was turned I went down to the village and found the oldest Jopland in the place. He was also that troublesome creature the oldest inhabitant. He was as well up in his own humble family history as Sir Percival was in that of the Joplands. I learned the fate of Sarah Jopland, and why she haunted the ruined chapel of the Morton family.

I can say I cannot make known the result of my enquiries better than by reproducing the letter which two days afterwards I was able to write to Sir Percival. I can very well believe that he would have been very well pleased to have me now Sir Percival having sent it back to me accompanied by a curt note which begged me to leave Wick Court at once, and consider our acquaintance at an end. Here is my letter.

Wick Court, December 17th, 1877—My dear Sir Percival, I have the delight with which you will receive the intelligence that I have completely cleared up the mystery surrounding the person who haunted the chapel of the Morton family. I am glad to be able to set your mind at rest by assuring you that the ghost is not that of an ancestor of yours. The fact is, a very simple and modern case. The apparition is a comparatively modern one. Its first appearance was the one recorded on Nov. 20, 1819, and one of these iron bolts in the wall.

She was in distress—dreadful—threatened with a process for rent, and was at the time living under very false pretences—a dishonest woman. It appears that the late Sir Percival was extremely particular as to the get-up of his man, and that Sarah Jopland was a woman employed by the day to do the washing of Wick Court. Her appearance, you see, was a very simple one. She was dressed in a very simple dress, and she was very much distressed. She was very much distressed. She was very much distressed.
